Being a huge Murakami fan, a friend recommended
'Ghostwritten' to me. I was promised overtones of Murakami's style. The book is written in several sections, loosely connected, with a different character the focus each time. The first two sections are the best and closest to Murakami.

'Ghostwritten' depicts human nature at its best and worst. Jenni, a ghost writer struggling to cope with her own loss, is commissioned to work with Klara who is, for the first time, sharing memories of her childhood in Java and of being imprisoned in a Japanese internment camp. What I particular admire about the writing is how deftly Isabel Wolff reminds us of what was endured by so many ...
