Leaders who excel under pressure don't panic rather have control on one's self and have calming effect on others around them. They demonstrate confidence and boost confidence in others under pressure. They impact how everyone experience pressure and influence everyone to respond positively. When under pressure they get everyone's focus on key priorities to get things done rather than let worry takeover.

The idea that increasing pressure stimulates people to perform better and better, until an optimum point is reached, dates back to 1908.

Psychologists Robert Yerkes and John Dodson found that, when pressure exceeds this optimum point, it has the opposite effect and people's performance starts to suffer. This conclusion still holds today.
