"Due to peculiarities of the internal workings of PHP, if a reference is made to a single element of an array and then the array is copied, whether by assignment or when passed by value in a function call, the reference is copied as part of the array. This means that changes to any such elements in either array will be duplicated in the other array (and in the other references), even if the ...

By removing the ability to include the reference sign on function calls where pass-by-reference is incurred (i.e., function definition uses &), the readability of the code suffers, as one has to look at the function definition to know if the variable being passed is by-ref or not (i.e., potential to be modified). If both function calls and function definitions require the reference sign (i.e ...
