The argument of The Anxiety of Obsolescence is constructed through readings of the work of Thomas Pynchon and Don DeLillo, as well as through a critical engagement with the cultural contexts of that fiction, including scholarly work such as media and literary theory, but also popular journalism and phenomena such as Oprah's Book Club. Throughout, the book argues that the anxiety of obsolescence is first and foremost a writerly strategem, one that allows the novelist to create a protected ...

The Anxiety of Obsolescence: The American Novel in the Age ...

This is an extremely interesting study of the postmodern novel through the lens of obsolescence. The novel is not dead, or even dying, but anxiety about machines, networks, and spectacle and writing about these trends allows the novel to continue while at the same time positioning itself in its fight against other media.

The Anxiety of Obsolescence: The American Novel in the Age ...

Instead, The Anxiety of Obsolescence models a new critical practice that pays careful attention both to cultural milieu and to textual particulars, moving between extended close readings of a number of important contemporary U.S. novels and the broader historical, cultural, and technological context for that fiction, in order to return our critical attention to representations and to the specific ideological formations with which those representations interact.

The Anxiety of Obsolescence : Kathleen Fitzpatrick ...

The Anxiety of Obsolescence is a clear-eyed look into jittery screens, connecting the moving dots of new media with new considerations of traditional literature to outline 'the cultural purposes served by repeated proclamations of the novel's untimely demise.' It is one of those rare instances when a book you thought someone must have written but no one did suddenly appears--and you just as suddenly couldn't imagine anyone ever writing differently.

The Anxiety of Obsolescence: The American Novel in the Age ...

This chapter situates the major conceptual formations that undergird the anxiety of obsolescence. Neither technophobia nor the literary novel's obituary is new; each historical reappearance of these discourses simultaneously undercuts the gravity of our contemporary mobilizations of the notion of obsolescence and reveals the ideological work that those mobilizations perform.
